

U2: Essential Question

Noa Yehudayan

To what extent are stories also the human story, my story?

I believe that most stories, even without any human characters, represent a human story as well as share the same experiences to my own personal life. Each author has created characters with many different relationships to get their story across. No matter what situation they are put in, humans seek to be in the same positions as well as follow through with the same message and themes. To a certain extent, these stories help us understand situations that might be difficult or hard to interpret. At the end of the day, we all seem to struggle with the same dilemma's and each story becomes significant to tell that may connect to personal experiences.
