

Marla Cooper claimed that her uncle, Dan Cooper was in fact the D.B. Cooper. Marla claimed that Dan arrived to a thanksgiving family dinner seriously injured from what he told was a car crash, making her very suspicious. He did resemble the image witnesses' created, but they have not been able to match any fingerprints, as Marla admitted her uncle after he passed away from old age. As some are sure he was the man by the similarity in name, it has not been proven whether or not this man was the mysterious hostage seeker. It is quite common for uncaught criminals to try and cover up their wrongdoings in this way. This is just one of the many known tales about D.B. Cooper.

I personally prefer the theory that Cooper died from the impact of the fall and his money was scattered throughout the woods because it seems the most realistic. While it is possible to survive something like that, witnesses said that he seemed to use a practice parachute, meaning he probably never got the chute to open. And even though there is the slightest chance that Cooper survived, detectives prove that it is highly unlikely. It is also kind? of strange that nobody filed a missing person report or even missed Cooper, and the most believable reason for that is that he was a loner, meaning he didn't have many friends and wasn't close to his family. It is also very mysterious because despite the two planes trailing after the Northwestern flight, nobody seemed to witness his dangerous descent. I also prefer this theory because I like to think that the bad people will suffer the consequences, he stole money from an airline, and therefore faced the harsh consequence of death. consequently ...

awkward All of the D.B. Cooper theories are very interesting and mostly possible. Many think that he fell to his death, but others prefer to object. This is an interesting mystery because Cooper's body was never found and he was never identified. It seems quite fishy that nobody acknowledged his death or knew who he could be. This mystery is very popular because most people that hold up flights or airlines are identified and punished by law, but Cooper suffered a different kind of punishment; death. I do not think that
